DataViz: More Women Used Menstrual Hygiene Products In Rural India In 2019-21

Indicators of preventive health, such as sanitation and access to healthcare, which show how women's health might be improved in the longer term, have improved in India, shows the fifth National Family Health Survey.

by Shweta Kulkarni, January 23, 2018

Kolkata and Bhubaneswar. Indicators of preventive health, such as menstrual hygiene, sanitation and access to healthcare have improved in India between 2015-16 and 2019-21, shows data from the National Family Health Survey.

Preventive healthcare is one of the determinants of women's health outcomes. Preventive healthcare measures, such as regular checkups during pregnancy, help catch any health problems early, and measures, such as using hygienic methods of protection during menstruation and sanitation, help avoid the spread of diseases.

"Preventive healthcare includes measures taken to prevent and control spread of diseases, and it includes efforts to improve living conditions and make public health facilities more accessible so that timely testing and screening can be done", said Srinivas Venkatesh, a professor of mathematical statistics, (researcher in gender issues related to sanitation and labour markets), at the Indian School of Economics. Investing in preventive measures helps ensure a healthier population over the years."

Maternal Care

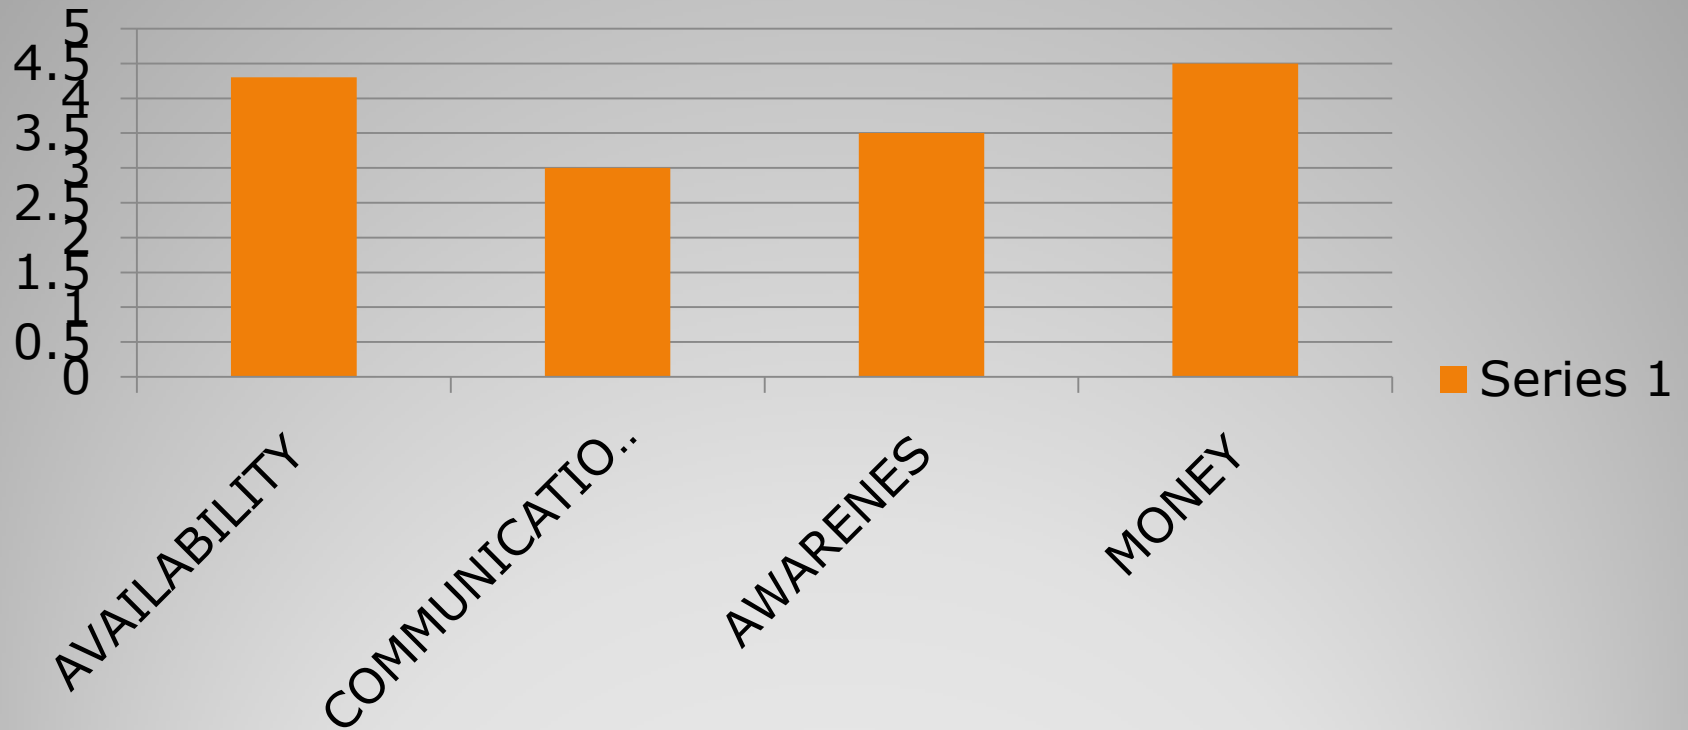

The Indian government advises at least four antenatal care visits (the World Health Organization recommends eight). These are correlated with lower neonatal deaths, lower maternal mortality and a higher likelihood of child survival. Six of every 10 women in India received at least four antenatal care visits (for last birth in the five years before the survey) between 2015 and 2016, an increase from five in 10 women in 2015-16.

The greatest improvement was in Chhattisgarh (55.9% to 61.9%), Madhya Pradesh (52.7% to 57.5%) and Rajasthan (54.5% to 58.5%).
